

Toby Isbell's infection

If you've worked in the Little Rock District for awhile, or even the Corps, you probably know Toby Isbell through his visual information creations or as the designer of Bobber the Water Safety Dog.

Recently the 17 year Corps employee, who's normally quiet and keeps to himself, got mixed up with a darker crowd whose goal is to scare the heebie-jeebies out of central Arkansas residents.

For the first time ever a local amusement park is switching themes from a water park to a zombie infested farm for Halloween. The transformation is partly inspired by Isbell's attraction to major theme parks like Universal Studio's Halloween Horror Nights which he's attended the past 11 years.

The park's owner turned to none-other-than Isbell, for his creepy creative expertise, to transform the normally laughter filled park into a town of terror designed to make you scream.

Before he was bitten by a zombie Isbell said “it’s been a great challenge and dream-come true to work on a project like this.” Now when you try to ask him a question all he wants to do is scream “arrggg” and try to eat your arm.

Starting Friday night, after sunset, you can see Isbell’s handiwork when the park opens to the public. The more than 30 minute walk through the park is not for the faint of heart.

This news is for internal information only concerning outside activates of various corps employees. This is not an endorsement of their work or any businesses they are associated with.